and the largest of these islands. Canabac is the easternmost, and that which is best known; with the inhabitants of none of the other islands had we any communication, except by one boat from Suoga, which lies to the N.W of it. There has not, it is said, been any known instance of these islanders having warred with each other.

He will probably have seen the point of Bulama. He is of tall six feet high; his large black eyes, the most penetrating I ever saw; his nose is long, large, and projecting; his teeth are white; his hands well proportioned; his understanding clear and acute; and in both body and mind he stands pre-eminent among his countrymen. But his courage, his boldness, his activity, his daring enterprises, and his love of war, which have rendered him the admiration of his own countrymen, have procured him, at the same time, the hatred and detestation of all the nations that lie within the reach of his lawless exultations.

Jaloram, on the contrary, is distinguished from the rest of his countrymen by his mildness and peaceable disposition. These people, like those before mentioned, have their poultry, goats, and cattle; cultivate rice, yams, &c.; and have all the common fruits of the country. Fish, which abound in numerous places, their cattle kills, and they have no other food, but with their spears; and these they throw with such striking certitude, as abundantly to supply their wants. Warang, or Formosa, is the most western, the most populous,
