Distrabit Animum Librorum Multitudo

TO-DAY, the truth of this aphorism will be readily acknowledged by anyone who contemplates the unending stream of new books which flows every week from the Press. Even the most assiduous reader feels acutely the need of some intelligent and reliable guide to help him discriminate between the good and the bad, between the books which will be likely to interest him and those which will not. THE TIMES LITERARY SUPPLEMENT affords him the very guidance he is seeking. It is the most comprehensive literary review published anywhere in the world. Though it deals principally with English and American books, no important new book published in any language is overlooked. Its criticisms are impartial and scholarly and, though unsigned, are the work of some of the foremost critics of the day. Books with a limited or specialized appeal are given as much prominence as biographies, novels, poetry and belles-lettres. Its pages, therefore, present a wide diversity of interest and are valued alike by the scholar, the student and the general reader.
