"IF I WERE NOT THE PRINCE OF WALES,"

said the Prince, "there is one job that I would delight to tackle. Special correspondent to a newspaper. It must be one of the finest jobs in the world."

No one is more eager for the new sensations than the Prince of Wales. The latest song, the latest dance, the latest aeroplane, the latest speed record — all these things intrigue him as they do most men of his age. He very rarely plays a game of cards. It means sitting too long in stuffy, overheated rooms. There have been occasions when official duties have necessitated his staying in some such tiresome atmosphere for an hour or two. But the moment he is free to go, you will find probably that he walks directly towards his own motor-car, takes the wheel, and goes rushing into the night like a young man in search of freedom.

One of the penalties of being a Prince is that he cannot even slip into the darkened shadows of a cinema without being recognised.

The Prince likes enthusiasm. He appreciates these manifestations as a tribute, not to himself, but to the British nation in general.
