KING EDWARD AT CARTAGENA.

At the banquet given on board the "Victoria and Albert" both King Edward and King Alfonso expressed their pleasure at their meeting, the recollection of which would never leave them. King Alfonso in a graceful speech referred to Queen Alexandra, saying that she knew the way to win all hearts, and honoured King Edward's knightly qualities. King Edward in his reply expressed the hope that an imminent happy event would give an heir to the throne of Spain.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to a question by Mr. Haddock, Member for North Lonsdale, as to what instructions had been given to Mr. Stead before his mission to the European courts with reference to the Hague Conference, the Foreign Secretary, Sir Edward Grey, replied that Mr. Stead's mission had had no connection with the British Government.

At the second reading of the proposals relating to the territorial army Mr. Wyndham in the name of the opposition, moved an amendment in which it was stated that Mr. Haldane's proposals since they destroyed the existing militia, discouraged the Yeomanry and laid new duties upon the volunteers, in times of national danger would not provide a sufficient force for home defence nor a rapid reinforcement of the regular field army. Mr. Wyndham criticised Mr. Haldane's proposals which, he said, lacked suitable coherence and would create a great gap between the first and second line of the territorial army, which would not be adapted to the objects for which it was destined. The reservists would not be adequately trained, the training of the regular troops would be hindered and recruiting would be endangered. He, the speaker, urged Mr. Haldane to reconsider his proposals.

WORK ON THE CANAL.

New York, April 9.

Many letters have been received here since Congress adjourned, from members of both Houses who have gone on pleasure trips to Porto Rico, Cuba and the Isthmus of Panama. All agree that everything is looking well in all three places. Porto Rico is said to be booming commercially. Cuba is said to be on the eve of a boom; and the Panama Canal is alleged to be much more of a substantial reality than most people had thought. Mr. Taft, who was a member of one of the parties of distinguished tourists, is reported to be as enthusiastic as any of them.

Other and more serious advices from the Isthmus agree with the tourists' reports, in respect to the work which is being done. Something like 40,000 labourers are at work, of whom about 20 per cent are Jamaican negroes, who are regarded as the best material obtainable for arduous work in the Isthmian climate. There would have been a good many more had it not been for the attitude of hostility to the recruiting agents taken up by Sir Alexander Swettenham, when Governor of Jamaica. It is hoped that the new Governor will be more complaisant in this labour business, but those Americans acquainted with Mr. Olivier express the opinion that the recruiting agents will "soon be sighing for Swettenham." Mr. Olivier, it is asserted, is a believer in the rights of the nigger, and other old-fashioned things, and is likely to export the best possible terms for the Jamaican negroes, who may be secured for service on the Isthmus. It is, as a matter of fact, largely a question of terms. Plenty of negro labour is available in Jamaica, but it cannot be obtained as cheaply as in the days of the old French Canal Company, and the American labour seekers seem slow to recognise the fact. One thing is practically assured, and that is that there will be no importation of Chinese labour.

In regard to the sanitary outlook in the Isthmus, it is said to be extremely good. So far there has been no abnormal amount of sickness. The medical department is basing its arrangements, however, upon the possibility of epidemics, and claims to be in a position already to deal with any emergency. The great outstanding fact is that the practical work of digging is going on steadily, and that the progress made is already perceptible to an ordinary observer.

NEWS FROM RUSSIA.

THE DUMA.

The conflict between the Government and the Imperial Duma, owing to the latter overstepping its prerogatives, still continues. The Prime Minister has addressed two letters to M. Golovin, President of the Duma, pointing out that the Government was aware that the Duma Committees for famine relief, and for examining the Budget, proposed to call in private individuals as experts. Such a proceeding was a considerable exceeding of its powers by the Duma and M. Stolypin begs the President of the Duma to inform him what measures the ruling body of the Duma have taken or intend to take in order to preserve the lawful order of things and to render impossible any infringement of the existing rules of procedure.

The Minister of the Interior has instructed the Governors to permit no village assemblies to discuss proposals referred to them by letter or telegraph by the Duma Deputies and incidentally to call to account persons guilty of such conduct.

At Tuesday's sitting the debate on the budget was continued. The most noteworthy of the speeches delivered was that of M. Fedorov, Deputy for St. Petersburg, who reminded the House that they could not demand too much from the present ministry since for two years it had been faced by an entirely novel situation and since owing to Russia's grave and troubled past it had entered on a difficult heritage. He pointed out that the Government could not reduce expenditure, its one task must be to increase the productive resources of the country. He blamed the Government in that while the estimates for the army and police continually grew they had taken such paltry steps for supporting such development of these productive resources. He described as destructive policy the export of provisions and the increasing of indirect taxation. His speech created a great impression. Many other speakers attacked the Government. M. Kokovzov, the Finance Minister made a long speech in defence of the budget, deplored the many digressions from the points at issue during the debate and pointed out that their main object at present was to reduce expenditures.

THE HAMBURG LABOUR CRISIS.

Few things have occurred in recent years more disconcerting to an Englishman than the employment, to the disadvantage of native labour, by the Hamburg-America steamship company of English dockhands at starvation wages at their Hamburg docks. There is no question of the men so employed being ill treated; even the blatantly Germano-phobe Daily Mail, always, so to speak, spoiling for a fight with this country, has performed to admit that the conditions on the compound ships are all that can be desired. But none the less, the fact that Hamburg dock labourers, dissatisfied with the conditions of labour, offered to them, can be and are being replaced by unemployed labour from England must give cause for reflection and grave at that. In the first place it is eminently undesirable that an international complexion should be conveyed to labour disputes, however acute. The whole matter is an interesting object lesson of the bitter bit; for years the mercantile classes in England have been inveighing against the importation of cheap labour from Germany. The German clerk is more industrious, more literate—he can nearly always command three languages—than his English rival, he is satisfied with a far lower rate of remuneration, inasmuch as his wants are fewer and his aspirations for small luxuries less intense. And now the tables are turned in very sooth; for the hated rival of the English artisan refuses conditions of labour in his own country which are deemed acceptable if not exactly desirable by his English contemporary. The fact that such a state of things is possible may well add another crumb of discomfort to the English out and out free trader. We are no advocates of Socialism, or of the extravagant demands of the Trades Unionists, and may even have rejoiced when the late Lord Penrhyn by his sturdy advocacy of his own rights succeeded in defeating the unauthorised pretensions of the agitation loving machinations of the self-elected spokesman of his employes, but it is a curious commentary on the alleged blessings of one-sided free trade when the workmen of the nation with the greatest shipping interests in the world are forced to accept in a foreign country wages and conditions of employment considered undesirable by the men of that country itself. It is hinted of course, needless to say, by our enterprising Germano-phobe contemporary, that the workmen in the Hamburg dockyards having fallen in with their employers' conditions as to the hours of labour, the continuance of the struggle is merely another phase of the anti-Socialist campaign, waged during the recent elections with such conspicuous success by the Imperialist party in Germany, for the dockers are said to be supported by Herr Bebel and his allies. In this theory the wish is most probably father to the thought. Whatever be the results to England of the German policy of self expansion, few sober-thinking people in this country cherish any feelings other than those of satisfaction at the result of the recent Reichstag elections in Germany. The early years of a century have frequently before in history been marked by social upheavals, and both in Russia and France at the present moment, and in England to a less marked degree, the increasing influence of the obviously self-interested proletariat is becoming a factor of grave concern to those interested in the commercial development of these countries. There is all the more reason, therefore, to be thankful that in this country at least, patriotism has proved superior to self-interest and it is the more to be regretted that England, whose claim to be the land of the free has been undisputed for centuries, should add fuel to the flames of that commercial rivalry bound to exist between her and Germany by the almost wanton introduction of cheap labour into Hamburg. The Utopian schemes of the English Labour party are far from attracting our admiration or support, but their attitude of abhorrence to the invasion of Hamburg by English unemployed labourers commands alike our interest, our sympathy and our support.

GENERAL NEWS.

(From our London correspondent.)

After King Edward and Queen Alexandra had left Toulon the sea became very rough but the "Victoria and Albert" proceeded on its way to Cartagena without experiencing any very great inconvenience on account of the weather.

One of the most pleasant incidents in connection with the young Queen of Spain is that the Pope has made up his mind to bestow the Golden Rose of Virtue on her Majesty. It is the highest Order which the Pope can confer on a Catholic Princess.

A report having been circulated that typhoid fever is on the increase at Cartagena, the greatest precautions have been exercised for the safety of their Majesties and water in large quantities has been despatched there from Madrid to be supplied to the British and Spanish Royalities, as the water at Cartagena is not regarded as being very pure.

Princess Henry of Battenberg who was present at the station to see King Alfonso and his mother off to Cartagena is in close attendance on her daughter Queen Victoria Eugenie, whose accouchement is anxiously awaited about the 15th inst.

In consequence of the heavy work attached to the production of Offenbach's "Hoffmann's Erzählungen" by the German company at the Adelphi Theatre, London, the first performance has had to be postponed until Wednesday, April 17.

Now that the White Star liner "Suevic" is in dry dock at Southampton, she will at once be examined to ascertain whether she has sustained any injury to her hull whilst on the rocks at the Lizard.

Mr. and Mrs. Kendal have received a very tempting offer of an engagement in the United States, which they are now considering, although they had no idea nor desire to go to America this year.

On all the Hamburg-America liners hat shops are about being opened and the stock will include all the best and fashionable makes in English, German, American and French hats. It seems probable that the largest demand will be for those manufactured in England.

The remarkable change which has taken place in the weather in London since the Easter holidays when it was quite summer-like, is most trying and may well cause foreigners to abuse the English climate. In the early hours of Sunday last snow actually fell but soon melted, and the weather has since remained very variable.

No better selection could possibly have been made than that of Lieut.-Col. Granville G. A. Egerton, C. B., to succeed Col. C. C. Munro, C. B., as Commandant of the School of Musketry, as he is an officer of remarkable experience in musketry training.

Miss Dorothy Edwardes, the eldest daughter of Mr. George Edwardes, who is to be married on the 29th inst. is just twenty years of age and particularly accomplished both as an amateur actress with a fine mezzo-soprano voice and as a sports-woman, for she rides, drives, motors and golfs well.

Perhaps of all the comic operas which have been seen in London translated into English none has been more popular than "La Fille de Madame Angot". M. Charles Lecocq, the composer of it, will this month celebrate the jubilee of his début as a writer of stage music. Amongst his other successes were "Le Petit Duc" and "Giroflé Girofla".

The suffragists were in full force on Sunday afternoon when the members of the Women's Social and Political Union held the first of their coming series of open-air meetings in Hyde Park. Very nearly 5,000 persons were present, many of whom treated the affair more in the light of a joke. Mrs. Pankhurst presided and was surrounded on the platform by Mrs. Despard, Mrs. Cobden-Sanderson, Mrs. Macaulay, Mrs. Winston Evans and Miss Biggs. A few speeches having been made, Mrs. Pankhurst put a resolution demanding that the Government should remove during the present session of Parliament the disabilities under which women suffer. Mrs. Pankhurst, amidst roars of hearty laughter, declared the resolution to be carried by a small majority.

The life of President Roosevelt has been threatened by a shipping clerk named Marcus Flores who has, of course, been arrested. Flores is under the impression that a pension is due to his brother's widow as his brother died in the Spanish-American war. One of his letters to the Commissioner of Pensions contains the words "My dagger is longer than the President's."

RANDOM NOTES.

The step taken by the State legislature of Utah will be received with mixed feelings in many quarters. Bridge playing is to be made a penal offence. Most of us number among our acquaintances one or two bridge players or bridge spoilers that certainly deserve solitary confinement after each rubber. The man who cheerfully declares a left sans about with two unguarded red suits and one black ace is practically a criminal and one has peculiar sympathy with the man who despairingly watching his partner's play, declared that he would have graved upon his tombstone "Here lies—in joyful anticipation of the last trump." What term of imprisonment could be too long for the unsophisticated young lady who in a moment of exhilaration at the swarthy hue of the hand dealt to her exclaimed "I make it spades and I double." The more one considers it, the more one is inclined to fancy that the latest flight of the Utah legislators is not without a sense of fitness, but one would like to know the reasons that have prompted the somewhat savage legislation. Can it be that the Representatives despair of raising the standard of play in Utah or have the guileless Mormons been fleeced by the stranger within their borders, who has elevated dealing into a fine art.

Local councillors in England have long been the butt of the scornful, especially since local Government legislation of recent years has resulted in many a municipal representative being more remarkable for sound common sense, which is frequently synonymous with obstinacy, than for education or literacy. It is an old story that a certain Mayor of a North England borough in thanking those present at a banquet for having included his wife's name with his own in a toast, remarked that a Mayor's wife like Caesar's wife must be "all things to all men". The latest lapse attributed to a new urban councillor in England, if less felicitous is not without humour. At a meeting of the council the chairman remarked that they had not got a quorum. "In that case" said the worthy representative, proud of the unwonted solvency of his native town, "we had better buy one!"

Stories of men who began life with sixpence, and ended multi-millionaires, usually come from America and probably rarely reflect the true state of affairs, but there seems no doubt that this description is very nearly true of the late Mr. Beecham, proprietor of the famous pill, the merits and virtues of which are blazoned forth in the advertisement pages of every English magazine, while flaring boards setting forth the peculiar properties of this priceless pill disfigure the landscape in many a fair prospect in rural England. Mr. Beecham, it appears, when first he patented this cure for all the ills the flesh is heir to, sold his particular specific from a barrel in the streets, and one day a woman who had derived unexpected relief from his medicine, exclaimed that they were worth a guinea a box. The phrase, chance uttered, was destined to become a household word in England and, for that matter, the world over, and Mr. Beecham's fortune was founded. A catch phrase is always of the greatest utility in furthering the sale of any article. Take for example, Monkey brand soap; its universal application is not due so much to its cleansing properties when applied to household utensils, but to the fact, set forth on every hand that it "won't wash clothes." Why the public should be so eager to buy an article that has so serious a limitation is hard to determine, but possibly in this age of shams, they are delighted to find something which is not ashamed to own that there is a point beyond which it cannot and will not go.

On Monday afternoon Mr. Lloyd George opened what may be an epoch-making institution viz. a training school for sea cooks. The institution is not exactly a novelty, for there has been a small training school in existence for the past six years, and some 1,700 pupils have passed through its hands, so that it may be surmised that there are a good many merchant vessels on which the meals have ceased to be a weariness to the flesh. By the new Merchant Shipping Act which comes into force next year, every ship will be bound to carry a trained cook; good news for merchant sailors, the vileness of whose fare has been proverbial. The language will presumably lose one of its opprobrious terms, for to be called the "son of a sea-cook" has hitherto been as dire a reproach as to be dubbed a "son of a gun", though in what lies the sting of this latter appellation it would be hard to say.

A curious incident is recalled by the death of Canon McColl, who is described as a tiny man with a tiny voice. Some years ago the London Times published a series of articles signed "Scrutator" fulminating with bludgeon-like severity against Germany and German aims. Public opinion at once fastened upon no less a man than Mr. Gladstone as the author of the letters, and Professor Max Müller in attempting to reply to one of them lamented that he could only "use a wooden sword" to cope with an antagonist who was "one of the most powerful mental athletes of the day, who wielded the very brand Excalibur". His reference was, of course, to the ex-Premier, and his chagrin must have been great when he found that the author of the letters was not the clarion-tongued politician, but the meek-voiced ecclesiastic, Canon McColl.

The Management and the troupe who undertook and played "Sweethearts" and "Chiselling" on Tuesday evening at the Hotel Bristol succeeded in winning all hearts and "chiselling" out a reputation for themselves. The crowded house and the appreciation shown by the audience were proof of this. The acting throughout was excellent and the occasion thoroughly enjoyable, the scene an altogether brilliant one. The large Hall, transformed into an up-to-date theatre, was gay with the dominance of ladies' costumes, while an orchestra added to the charm of the occasion with a well selected programme of theatrical strains. Apart from the generous attendance and the commendable endeavours of each individual performer, the success of these Theatricals is due to the inspiring energy and histrionic talent of Mr. Lyon, who not only played his part as if to the manner born, but drilled and stage-managed indefatigably. The dramatic contrast "Sweethearts" is a charming comedy representing love at twenty and the recalling of that youthful love at fifty. When, sharp to time, the handsome curtain which screened the stage was drawn for the first time, it disclosed a garden with a sunny park and avenue beyond. An old gardener, Wilcox, has a sapling in his hand which he gives to his master's daughter, Jenny Northcott, saying that it was left by Mr. Spreadbrow who will call soon. He calls, and the interview between "Harry and Jenny who had grown up together and loved each other as boy and girl" occupies the whole of the first Act, Wilcox having at last been sent on an errand by Jenny after some amusing sparring with Harry on the subject. Harry is going to India for a long time and very much in earnest in his pleading for a token. She is naively and heartlessly unconscious of his meaning, though the real state of her mind, so far as she has one, was shown by her talk with Wilcox about the sapling. She lets Harry help her to plant the sapling. Then he begs for an emblem, something that he may carry with him always. She gives him a large plant in a pot. He asks for a flower, and at last she gives him one, and takes one from him in return but immediately throws it carelessly down. The parting on his side is very affecting, on hers indifferent almost to coldness though—at his entreaty, that she will say something, whether for good or ill—she does wish him a pleasant voyage, and asks him to think of her now and then, in India.

When the curtain is drawn for the second Act the lover of 30 years ago returns to the scenes of his youthful love, surmising what life has had in store for Jenny! They meet in the self-same garden where the avowal of love was made; old associations are renewed; the incident of the exchange of flowers is banteringly recalled by Sir Henry Spreadbrow, but pathetically by Miss Northcott: the sapling they planted together has become a "spreading chestnut" under whose shade the old affection is gradually rekindled in the callous heart of Spreadbrow still young enough, however, to warm into love for his old "Jenny". The curtain falls on a betrothed pair. "Sweethearts" is cleverly written, and was worthily and cleverly acted by the Misses Pauline Papenhagen and Margaret Sloggett and Messrs. Hugh Lyon and Dunstan Rhodes. Mr. Lyon, distinctly good in both acts, was admirable in the second, so admirable indeed that, if it were not a libel on his personality, we might say it seemed a periphrasis, a piece written round him, so naturally and successfully did he fill the character. Miss Papenhagen played her real self, and that spells what is natural and charming, in the first scene, and adapted herself splendidly to the fictitious conditions and elderly-spinsterhood of the second act; her part was a careful and consistent study of girlish light-heartedness and womanly constancy. Mr. Rhodes' "Wilcox" the gardener was a surprising feat of self-effacement and transformation, while Miss Sloggett looked sweet and wept touchingly as the neat maid "Ruth."

"Chiselling" is one of the best and funniest farces ever written. Larkspur, a dilettante sculptor, falls in love with an heiress, but a senile Uncle and Guardian, Dr. Stonecrop (Mr. Tibbs), who imagines himself artistic and a connoisseur particularly of sculpture, will only consent to the match on the condition that Larkspur's (Mr. Fraser! Who knows him?) work satisfies the canons of his taste and judgment. A figure of Alexander the Great, costing some few shillings to purchase, was accidentally smashed by the broom of Mrs. Piper the landlady (Miss Sloggett) just before the visit of the Stonecrops. Larkspur's soaring and songs are damped; he is in despair. A happy inspiration seizes him and he is spurred on once more to success in his scheme. He dresses and plasters up his well set up manservant Trotter (Mr. Rhodes) as Alexander the Great. The Stonecrops arrive. The Doctor is delighted with the chef d'oeuvre, but his faddiness insists on certain improvements necessitating the use of chisel and hammer. The calves must be reduced, the nose chipped, and various other ways of dealing with the figure are suggested, much to the consternation of the dignified Trotter in his Royal rôle. During the absence of the company at luncheon, Trotter descends from his pedestal to refresh his marble self—all marvellous to behold!—with porter and pie. In his dry condition he imbibes too much and his plaster self becomes animated. His playful facetiousness thereafter when the company re-assembles in the studio causes the fraud to be betrayed, but not before the old Doctor has consented to the wedding and "Genius and Beauty" are pledged to one another, the latter having meanwhile been let into the secret.

"Mr. Fraser" as Larkspur, unrecognisable on his set-up, was admirable throughout. "Trotter" made a great Alexander, very great indeed, and brought down the house over and over again with more ease than he brought himself down from the pedestal. The Doctor was senility itself, assumed of course. Mrs. Piper was a typical lodging house keeper—marvellous that youth and beauty could come to such a disguise!—while Kate (Miss Fortescue Carr) was happy playfulness and charm throughout. The farce bristles with amusing situations, and abounds in happy jokes and bons mots, none of which were lost on an audience kept in a hilarious humour throughout the performance. Something more than enjoyment possessed the audience. Not only the applause but the enthusiastic praise since the Theatricals are evidence of appreciation and gratitude for all the hard work and histrionic talent which provided so thoroughly enjoyable an occasion.

THE INTERNATIONAL HORTICULTURAL EXHIBITION, DRESDEN.

The work of preparation for this promising exhibition is being actively pushed on in the Exhibition Palace and park. His Majesty King Friedrich August will open the Exhibition on the 4th of May. The Queen Dowager and the Princes and Princesses have been invited to the ceremony. Important prizes are offered to exhibitors. Not only Saxony, but other Governments also, will offer medals. The Prize of Honour given by the German Emperor—a large porcelain vase with the portrait of Kaiser Wilhelm II. and a view of the Castle in Berlin—and the King of Saxony's prize, also a porcelain vase, deserve special mention. Local and other societies connected with horticulture, as well as private individuals, have also offered prizes. There will be a concert every day at the Exhibition from 4 to 11 o'clock p. m., at times also in the forenoon. The programme for the present is as follows: on Friday, May 3 the judges will begin their duties; on Saturday, May 4 the opening takes place; on Sunday, May 5 the Congress deutscher Gartenkünstler will be held; on Monday afternoon there will be a banquet; on Tuesday a gala performance at the opera; during the day explanatory lectures will be given in the Exhibition by Hofrat Professor Dr. Drude; on Wednesday a steamer excursion will be made to Saxon Switzerland and the Bastei; and on Thursday there is to be an exhibition of flower-binding. As yet 8,058 square meters have been allotted to horticulture and 2,973 square meters for apparatus.

The guards in the city today are furnished by the Schützen Regiment No. 108. The band plays about 12.30 p. m. in the Neustadt.

Some psychologist has asserted that the instinct in many men, great or small, that leads them to pose, in order to give dramatic effect to their words or actions, has at times been so strong as to be unconquerable, even by death. History records an amusing instance of this in the case of Sir Francis Burdett, who was condemned to the Tower for high treason. Sir Francis (says the New York Tribune) resisted the order; his house was attacked by detachments of the cavalry and infantry; an infuriated mob raged outside. When the door was broken down, Burdett was found calmly seated in his library, his infant son upon his knee, whom he was teaching to read Magna Charta.

William Pitt, perhaps the greatest of British orators, was, according to Grattan, "an incomparable actor." Pitt would seize upon every trifling occurrence with the rapidity of lightning, which could add force to his eloquence. It is related that on one occasion when attacking a Radical motion late at night, the lights in the House went out. Pitt paused, and then in the darkness his voice rang out: "Go on! If the constitution must be wounded, let it receive its mortal stab now, in this dark and midnight hour!" Action on the motion was postponed, and finally lost. One of Pitt's opponents afterward said: "He made us feel like conspirators doing a bloody deed, simply by the lack of candles and his marvellous voice." Pitt was fully aware of the effect of this. He once solemnly began a speech upon colonial reforms by the words, "Sugar, Mr. Speaker," when he was interrupted by a smothered laugh from some of the younger members. He paused, glared from bench to bench, and then, in a white heat of fury, cried out, "Sugar! Sugar! Sugar!" three times. So powerful were the tones of the orator, that a frightened silence followed. He looked at the awe-struck members, and said contemptuously, "Who laughs at me and sugar now?" and went on with his speech. On another occasion while hurling contempt at Lord Effingham, he suddenly appealed to a figure in the tapestry on the wall as "an immortal ancestor of this degenerate lord, indignant at the disgrace of his race and country." So fine was the action, we are told, that the House thrilled with excitement, only remembering afterward that the "great shade" whose wrath he deprecated was worked by a needle upon the canvas.

The passion for acting could go no further than in a Duke of the great French house of Rohan, who, being told that he had only a half-hour to live, caused himself to be taken up, dressed in court costume, with all his orders and jewels, and seated in the banqueting room, where he received his friends with grace and dignity. Finding himself growing blind, he rose, exclaiming, "Ah, the King is here!" saluted, and fell dead. Napoleon, according to his biographers, possessed dramatic talent of no low grade. Indeed, it has even been asserted that he took lessons of the celebrated player Talma. At any rate, the Corsican on no occasion lost sight of the dramatic possibilities of a word or an action. How the devoted legions must have thrilled, when, under the shadow of the Pyramids, he delivered to them his "Soldiers, from these Pyramids forty centuries look down upon you!"

LATEST TELEGRAMS.

Cartagena, April 10. The British squadron weighed anchor at 4 o'clock this morning. King Alfonso and the other members of the Spanish Royal Family started at 8 o'clock on their return journey to Madrid.

London, April 10. (From our own London correspondent.) The Newcastle police last night arrested a tailor named Hogarth in whose house another store of ammunition was found, similar to that seized previously. The quantity in Hogarth's house consisted of 25,000 Mauser pistol cartridges, 36,500 rifle cartridges, and hundreds of bandoliers. The cartridge boxes were marked "Geladene Metallpatronen". Hogarth was charged today with unlawful possession of explosives, and remanded. He declares that he innocently and unknowingly undertook the storage; but these repeated discoveries of arms and ammunition in the North of England create a veritable panic among the population, and the wildest rumours are afloat, even that both the consignments seized were intended for a coming German invasion of England.

Tangier, April 10. The agreement as to the combined installation and working of a wireless telegraphic station may be considered as assured, now that the British envoy has been empowered by his Government to assent to the proposal which has been accepted by the representatives of Germany, France, and Spain.

St. Petersburg, April 10. An Imperial Ukase dated March 30 orders that the relatives of those killed in suppressing revolt or murdered by the revolutionaries shall receive the same pensions as relatives of those killed by the enemy in battle.
