THE CASE FOR THE DEFENCE.

Bulgaria has been taken severely to task in many quarters for what is described as her inopportune declaration of independence and her violation of the Treaty of Berlin, and it may, therefore, be worth while to examine the question from her own point of view, in the interests of fair play. Can it honestly be said that Bulgaria would have been wiser to wait until Turkey and the Great Powers would have acquiesced in this step? History records very few instances of a declaration of independence with the consent of the suzerain Power. Prussia did not act with the consent of the Holy Roman Empire. Belgium did not inform the Dutch king of her intention to form an independent kingdom. It was certainly not Sweden's desire that Norway should sever the Union, but the latter country offended its sovereign without being punished for it. There is very little doubt that Norway had more reason to be grateful to Oscar II. than Bulgaria to Abdul Hamid. In all the instances cited above the ruling Power has strongly objected in one way or another against the independent step taken by its vassal. Nobody heard anything of an energetic protest from England when Russia fortified Batoum contrary to the stipulations of this very Treaty of Berlin. Neither did Downing Street make its voice heard when Colonel Vassas landed in Crete, thus violating Turkish territory, nor when Prince George of Greece raided Crete with his torpedo-boats and Crete was proclaimed quasi-independent.

It is very much to England's interest that Bulgaria, powerful and independent, should eternally bar to Russia the way to Constantinople, eliminating for ever the nightmare of a Muscovite advance on the Golden Horn. It will be Bulgaria's main interest to live in peace with liberal Turkey; and, moreover, an independent Bulgaria will be a much better guarantee for the maintenance of peace than a country struggling for a more tolerable position among the Powers. The personality of King Ferdinand, who had many previous chances of making Bulgaria independent and himself a king, is a pretty sure guarantee for the maintenance of law, order, and moderation. Western Europe should really be proud that a scion of two of her noblest houses has been chosen to revive the ancient Czarism of Bulgaria. It is, therefore, England's interest to view with a benevolent eye the youngest kingdom, and to extend a fraternal hand to another country's free ruler.

The same course of 14 lectures will be given in German at the same place and hour by Mr. Sherwood on Wednesdays, beginning on October 14. For particulars apply at Villa Sherwood.

At the Central Theatre today there will be two performances: the first begins at 3.30 p. m., at half-prices, the second at 8 o'clock in the evening, at the usual prices. The whole company of artists engaged for October will appear at each performance.

We have much pleasure in recommending ladies who for themselves or their children desire instruction in painting on china to pay a visit to the studio of Herr Rössner, Werder Strasse 11, parterre left. Here they will be able to judge of the style and beauty of the work of that kind done by Herr Rössner himself, both in portraiture and landscapes. They will also, we think, be able to assure themselves that under Herr Rössner their studies will be pursued with equal pleasure and profit. We have independent testimony of the most cordial kind to the high excellence and conscientiousness of his teaching.
