of the costliness of the material employed: silver cloth, velvet, brocade; covers, ornaments and clasps made of noble metals, plates of hammered copper or brass or enamel.

Finally the perfumery branch especially shows a decided fondness for original forms—bottles in human or animal form, boxes which open like a cupboard or a book, and so on.

But I begin to stray away from my theme, for here it is no longer a question of wrappings, but of articles of artistic value, often more precious than their content. Here it is a question of a whole branch of industry, complete in itself, that is to say, the artistic gift, and these objects must be studied in detail by themselves.
