a mere copy of nature is to be sure, a true reflection of reality, but it is not remembered. Even the clearest reflection must become tiresome in time. He succeeds in mobilising the independent powers of imagination latent in his observers, in releasing their creative energies, in forcing their co-operation.

Consider the pictures for the North German Lloyd. The monumental exaggeration of the gigantic ship's hull attracts us magnetically, forcefully towards it. The rounded, comfortable bows of the projecting lifeboat with its dark coat of iron plates inform us with a sense of trust and confidence, the noble curve of the white decks or the mysterious charm of a cloud looming up in the distance lure us to far foreign journeys. These pictures have an indefinable atmosphere. A strong and
