

DORE MÖNKEMEYER-CORTY

it suitable tasks. This source of energy, so essential to progress, flows very sparsely to-day, or it is mopped up by those without ability. Just as it is beyond dispute that poverty causes intellectual powers to decay, physical charms to fade and human hearts to turn to stone—thus all artistic bravour must be extinguished when it finds no suitable field in which to spread its wings. Trans. by E. T. S.

25