His history has been varied enough. He passed his childhood in many foreign countries and in many foreign schools where he frequently hardly understood the language spoken. So he made himself understood with his pencil, und drew all sorts of things with chalk on the blackboard, whereby he gained the sympathy of his teachers and fellow pupils. Later on he joined the School of Art in Milan, but it was much too classical in tone for his temperament. He then studied engineering, farming, and all sorts of things, until he finally landed once more in a school of art, but in Rome this time.

Here he became an enthusiastic Fascist, and began to draw political caricatures for the Fascist paper "J'Impero". At last he had found his real career and hence the way to appeal to the general public.

For his caricatures at once became the rage, and when he went to Paris he soon
