

INGE PETERSEN
BERLIN

sudden and absolutely inflationary flooding of the market with colour photographs of different quality constitutes a very serious menace to a process which is good in itself, but which, all the more, requires quiet steady development, for it is governed by factors which are by no means only purely technical but equally psychological. While it is obvious that efforts should be made to secure technical improvements, it should not be overlooked that people in general have only a