witches of all sorts and sizes. Children from the whole neighbourhood swarmed in to the Plumps' home in crowds. At last, a stage was also put up, and dolls' plays were performed before a huge, children's audience.

The magic of all the gaily-coloured puppets had long enough held their creator in the magic of their thrall, and thus there developed a hundred per cent Dolls' Mother, who ultimately undertook a merrily-adventurous Baltic trip, and then began to perform with her dolls in Berlin. That was Plump's "German Marionette Show" (Deutsche Spielfigurenbühne), for which the artist Klumbies wrote little plays, and which was housed in an old villa before the gates of Berlin, but, for a while, had to stop its performances for lack of funds.

The stock marionettes leaned sadly against the walls of the wings and cast sad looks at the theatre management, author, and scene-painters. Hadn't everyone striven might and main to make the theatre well-known? Hadn't a car, full of dolls bowing right and left, driven criss-cross through the vast city time and again? Hadn't Mrs. Plump herself travelled miles, and miles, and miles in the tube, favourite Punch under arm? Her heroic love
