his power of imagination. He takes a keen and lively interest in all the aspirations and trends of art to-day but only in so far as they avoid exaggeration and vagueness of aims. His artist's ideal may be briefly summed up in the principle: keep aiming at still greater perfection of form. His efforts in art are directed towards articulate and vigorous form. He is an advocate of a moderate modernity and his innate enthusiasm for classic and architectonic conceptions is noticeable in his work. I might even be allowed to say that he is too serious
