GEORG KONECSNI

Actually then, in the life of the Hungarian nation, it is not all gaiety and lightheartedness; serious strains are to be found, and intensive application to work, which are even beginning to drown the care-free voices that sing the praises of a superficial conception the course of time, this naturally gave rise to the formation of views and opinions peculiar to Hungary alone. Moreover, the unusual and exposed position of the country was bound to have an influence on the character and receptivity of its inhabitants, giving them their own peculiar traits. These found forms of expression in the necessary absorption and reproduction of a great diversity of cultural influences pouring in from neighbouring peoples, and in the steady development of their own creative efforts also. Thus in Hungary diverse types of temperament live and work, developing their individualities according to their environment.
