

draughtsmanship. There are two totally different methods of illustrating books. The one takes the chief events dealt with in the book and reproduces them in pictures. The main points are seized upon as chapter follows chapter, so that the course of the tale is shown in a series of high lights. The second method, on the other hand, makes no attempt at reproducing high

Erth Becker, the South German painter, has made his appearance as a born illustrator in book art. He happily combines a spontaneous "delight in story-telling" with a keen sense for the art of reading and excellent
