

If two different people were to take photographs of the same model with the same camera there would be little similarity between the two pictures. It is not the camera with its purely mechanical process that obtains the desired effect but always the person working it. The more he masters the technique of photography, the more easily can he hope to aspire to something really good, to a photograph so excellent that it