on an old incident

PHARAOH'S daughter went tripping down the garden path. It was great to be alive. The birds were singing, the sun was shining.

She was hastening to a tryst in the cool shade of the pyramids with Tut Tut Heman, a swagger young officer in the armies of the Pharaoh.

Cool was the path in the shade of the giant bulrushes. Suddenly a thin cry rent the still air. Startled, she leaned over. There on a pile of sheets in a basket lay a lusty infant.

"My word," thought the princess. "Can't a person even take a walk—"

Another look. Suddenly she knelt and intently examined the basket. "What simply stunning sheets," she exclaimed, "I'll have them for my royal boudoir."

"And the infant?" timidly ventured a hand-maiden.

"Oh, bring Moses along," ordered the princess.

"Of course some skeptics may lift their brows and say this story is a bit naive. But then he deserves his day for introducing me to Lady Pepperell sheets."
